MR. WOLFSOHN'S STAR TURN

THERE is a girl in London Called Jenny Johnson who can sing four and a half octaves. In the 18th and early 19th centuries there were in every generation one or two sopranos with a compass of three octaves; Mara Banti, Billington, Catalani, Aguiari, are the names which come in the history books. Of these, the greatest seems to have been Lacrezia Aguiari. In 1770, Mozart quoted in a letter a long, florid, agile passage which he sang in his presence; it took her from middle D to two C's above high C. We know from Burney's "History" that she was good down to Middle A, so that gives her a compass of three octaves and three notes. Mozart's father described her thus:

three octaves and three notes. Mosart's father described her thus:

"She is not hardsome, nor yet ugly, but has at times a wild look in her eyes, like people who are subject to convulsions, and she is lame in one foot. Her condert, severtheless, has been good."

Fanny Burney, deeply moved by her singing, saw her as Protean: "She sang in twenty styles," and: "She is just what she will." I shall return to this later.

In the past hundred years the emphasis in voice training has tended to move away from the wide compass and towards strength and expressiveness, in part to enable singers to dominate the larger post-Wagner-ian orchestra. But the three-octave soprano has recently reappeared in the "Inca" singer Yma Sumac. In her published records she uses a compass of three octaves and one note. The historical picture is thus one of a normal compass of two or two and a half octaves, above which exceptional singers arise who use three, or just over.

Jenny Johnson is 23, the daughter of a chartered accountant. She has a reliable and effortless command of four octaves and five notes, from F below the bass clef to the second C above the treble clef. The top note is the same as Agularis, the bottom note a tenth lower.

what's a "Pathophone?"

In Israel they call a grammophone a "pathophone." Why? The first grammophones that appeared in the country way back, were made by the French firm of Patho and bore the trade-name "Pathophone." In the course of time this became the accepted name for any grammophone.

The same thing happened to "AMA," the first synthetic cleaning liquid in the country. Today "AMA" has become the accepted all-round term for "detergent," a new word in the dictionary, as it were.

AHAD HA'AM'S LIFE and WORK

A True Portrait

There was an inescapable elash and conflict in both Ahad. Ha'am the man and Ahad Ha'am the man and Ahad Ha'am the writer and thinker, and even more so in the uncrowned leader of the Zionist movement in Russia. Many views that were attributed to him by well-meaning but misunderstanding followers, were not at all his, and the fallacy that Ahad Ha'amism was identical with something I ke political defeatism is squarely exposed in the light of a mass of detail. Not until the reader has waded through this mass of detail will he have a true notion of what Ahad Ha'am real's stood for.

Again, the conflict between the rationalist and the man who was in essence a traditional, though by no means an observant, Jew is successfully underscored in Sir Leon's fifth chapter "Portrait Of The Man." as is the moral nobility and integrity of the man who, himself modest to the utmost, never suffered fools or charlestans gladly.

Hiallik said of him that because of the stamp of truth and humility that was unmistakable in his personality, and because he was the first to extricate hebrew literature from its provincialism, and the first to extricate hebrew literature from its provincialism, and the first to extricate hebrew literature from its provincialism, and the first to extricate hebrew literature from its provincialism, and the first to extricate hebrew literature from its provincialism, and the first to extracte the here we literature from its provincialism, and the first to extracte the brew literature from its provincialism, and the first to extracte the brew literature from its provincialism, and the first to extracte the brew literature from its provincialism, and the first to extracte the brew literature from its provincialism, and the first to extracte the brew literature from its provincialism, and the first to extracte the brew literature from its provincialism, and the first to extracte the brew literature from its provincialism.

ISRAEL IN FOUR DIMENSIONS

Preface by Andre Mairaux. Cover and frontispiece by Chagail.

Editions Clairefontaine, Lausanne. 159 pp.

This handsome album succeeds in portraying Israel in four dimensions, in time, that is, as well as space.

The millennial perspective is already apparent in the cover by Chagail. A half-risen sun reveals, in the still-lingering deep blue of night, the faint green of a tree, the contours of an ancient tent, of new huta the shimmering mass of a white city of today in the mountainous background. On the frost-ispiece, a crayon profile of crowned King David strums a lyre.

Andre Mairsux's preface is a community of intellectuals and

Roman Finds in Britain

Clothed in a Yorkshire peat-bog.
After the Haverfields, the Colingwoods, the Richmonds and the Wheelers, come the students of small things to fill in the picture, but it would be a mistake to see Dr. Liversidge as author of a voluminous work (as yet, so far as I know, unpublished), on the Roman villas of Britain, and brings to the study of Romano-British furniture a wide knowledge of the Hellenistic and Roman material of the Mediterranean and other countries. The actual British finds are of course mere fragments, but Dr. Liversidge reconstructs them by the use of completer specimens from abroad and by comparisons with representations on tomb reliefs and other monuments in Britain and elsewhere.

Sometimes of course, the very proof of the existence in Britain to plant the Forest of Martines and the procession of children helping to plant the Forest of Martines and the procession of children helping to plant the Forest of Martines and the procession of children helping to plant the Forest of Martines and the procession of children helping to plant the Forest of Martines and the procession of children helping to plant the Forest of Martines and the procession of children helping to plant the Forest of Martines and the procession of children helping to plant the Forest of Martines and the photographs by Lis, which, as Andre Malraux Fightly points out, are not the familiar documentary pleces, or course, is in the photographs by Lis, which, as Andre Malraux Fightly points out, are not the familiar documentary pleces, or ightly points out, are not the familiar documentary pleces, or fightly points out, are not the familiar documentary pleces, or fightly points out, are not the familiar documentary pleces, or prictives, is in the photographs by Lis, which, as Andre Malraux Fightly points out, are not the familiar documentary pleces, or fightly points out, are not the familiar documentary pleces, or prictive, is in the photographs by Lis, which, as Andre Malraux Fightly points out, are not the familiar documentary plece

Sometimes of course, the very proof of the existence in Britain of the furniture in question rests on analogy. Couches, chairs, folding stools and tripods, tables soft furnishings and other items are treated in turn. The general question arises as to whether the representations of furniture on tomb-reliefs do not reflect formal conceptions rather than locally manufactured material, but the evidence on tables seems to favour the latter probability. On the question of textile draperies, we can now add the newly discovered reference in the Edict of Diocletian to highly priced British tapetsi (rugs). On p.48, Dr. Liversidge might have usefully said that one of the sources of fine wood for Roman furniture was Cyrenaican thuron (juniper?).

As usual, there is a tenuous link with our own area: the fine tombstone of the Catuvellaunian Regina, wife of Barates, from South Shields, is the only one in Britain to include Palmyran in its Inscription, and Barates was a fing-dealer. He was not the only Semite in Roman Britain, and his name was sometimes used by Jews. It is interesting that history's first known Hertfordshire woman should have married a Syrian whose language was closely akin to Hebrew. Her father's name, recorded in Palmyran, was Harry.
Professor J. Toynbee, doyen of Roman art, bestows her blessing on this little book, whose plates alone would make it worthwhile. It will be mainly useful to curators and archaeologists, but art-lovers, economic historians, and theatrical designers should take note.

tradesmen over into a nation of peasant-soldiers; but," says Malraux, "the peasants of the kibbu/z are not like peasants elsewhere, these fighters are not entirely soldiers, this nation is no more comparable with the old nations of Europe than with the nations of America which were created by uprooted energies."

In Israel the religiousness of the past, the devotion to justice, lives on in the present even among the sternest rationalists. "In spite of everything, God is there still; and the Bible is the national literature of the State of Israel," observes Malraux, who detects overtones of former sadness even in the laughter of the children.

our time, intimately and pene-tratingly. His pages, for example, on Judah L. Magnes, are excel-lently written and offer shrewd insights into a complex man. He writes with familiarity of Dr. Chaim Weizmann, Dr. Stephen S. Wise, Shmarya Le-vin and, on the other hand, Dr. Ralph Bunche of the United Na-tions, Of even more significance are his vignettes of the old-time American Zionists, now unre-membered and largely unknows, who sold Jewish National Fund stamps, who went from door to stamps, who went from door to door to solicit funds from Jews who may or may not have been friendly to the Zionist dream.

Julius Haber, who had had a successful business career, contributed heavily to the Zionist movement and invested generously in the land when investing in anything in Palestine was foolhardy. He lost a great deal, but never his faith in the people and in the land. Much of what he describes — the development of Zionism in America, the political battles in the United States for recognition of a Jewsish Homeland, the history of

We tend to forget, today, the importance of door-to-door canvassing and perhaps we look down at the folks who always recall the "good old days." Yet it was men like Haber, no less than the pioneers who cleared the swamps and built the land, who were responsible for creating Israel, Haber would deny this vehemently, but that would not blur its truth.

This book was worth the writing, and it would profit anyone interested in Zionism to read it. It is the story of a life, a good, life, of one of the soldiers in the ranks of Israel, Haber the story of a life, a good, life, of one of the soldiers in the ranks of Israel, Haber the story of a life, a good, life, of one of the soldiers in the ranks of Israel, Haber the story of a life, a good, life, of one of the soldiers in the ranks of Israel, Haberth has already been won.

Circassians Discuss Moving to Turkey

Moving to Turkey
TIBERIAS, Thursday, — Israel's Circassian comunity is considering emigrating to Turkey.

The Circassians, who consist of only a few hundred families, are Israel's smallest minority.
They live in two villages, Rehana in Upper Gailiee and Kfar Kama in Lower Galilee.

As Israel Circassians originate from Turkey, they have many relatives among the thousands of Circassians living there.

A few Circassians who returned lately from a visit to Turkey praised the economic and social condition of the Circassians, and have discussed with the Turkish authorities the possibility of uniting the families of both countries.

Government's policy had had U.S., Mr. Sharett said that the Government's policy had had some positive results: it had slowed down the process of the forming of military alliances between the U.S. and the Arab states and the granting of arms to them.

The seeking of arms had pushible the cuestion of a defence of the cuestion of a defence of the cuestion of a defence of the cuestion.

The seeking of arms had pushed the question of a defence pact into the background, Mr. Sharett said But if such a pact was objected to, not on practical grounds, but because of some "holy principles" that had nothing to do with the security of Israel, then the Government could not identify itself with such a stand.

To speakers who had urged the Government to make greater efforts to win over the nations of Asia and who suggested that a neutral policy would do the trick Mr. Sharett replied:

"If there are nations which refuse to establish normal ties with us in no case is it because Israel is not neutral as between East and West; in every case it is because the nation in question is not neutral as between Israel and the Arabs."

Mr. Sharett said he did not see how the proposed budget for the Foreign Ministry would suffice for all its tasks, but it would do its best, and even a little more.
